Last night in New York City, there were plenty of comics and models at Details and Cinema Society's screening of The Hangover, the new comedy about a stag night in Vegas that goes awry. As Rob Thomas, Molly Sims, and Alan Cumming sat down for the movie, star Justin Bartha discussed Sin City. "Because it has that title," he said, "when people go there they make it just that. Really it's the people that are full of sin and they need an outlet, and Vegas is the outlet."

After the screening, guests such as Nicole Miller, Shoshanna Lonstein Gruss, and Amy Sacco headed over to the yard at the SoHo Grand. "I even laughed all the way through the credits, which never happens," Byrdie Bell said. Actors Caroline Rhea, Jesse Eisenberg, and Lake Bell mingled with Paula Abdul as a gaggle of models, including Hilary Rhoda, Caroline Winberg, and Doutzen Kroes, nibbled on a frat-tastic dinner of fish and chips, sliders, and hot dogs. Danny Masterson revealed his own experience in Las Vegas: "I D.J. a lot there, and it's a lot of dudes from Jersey with tribal arm bands and slick hair that are really buff getting really drunk. Then you go to the poker room and have fun by taking all their money."

Across the courtyard, Will Arnett (whose Arrested Development co-star Jeffrey Tambor is also in The Hangover) and Zach Braff joked around while Gerard Butler chatted to Kelly Bensimon. "I probably would go to Vegas for a bachelor party," admitted Hangover star Bradley Cooper just before Andrew Saffir handed around shots of Jagermeister. "It really supercedes its reputation." Is there any other place that might come close? "Apparently Beirut in the 1940s was the ultimate place to party."
